

Introduction

It's been a while.

-show me-

You know, I really missed this series, and I've been digging a lot for more content for it. It's taken me a bit, but after trekking through the dark depths of the vast digital ocean we all call the internet, I think I'm finally ready. Let's bring it back... for season two.

-hype music-

Welcome back to Disturbing Things, your one stop shop for bite sized creepy discoveries that I've recently made online. If you're new to this series, hahahaho boy, you're in for a ride. If you're willing, check out the playlist on my channel to get caught up with the first ten episodes. If you're a fan of eerie, disturbing content, then I truly hope they're worth your while. Thank you for giving me the time of day to take you on a trip to the dark side.

Anyway, with that out of the way, buckle down because it's time once again, to dive into five more, hand picked, and Disturbing Things from Around the Internet.

The content in this video is disturbing, and may upset some viewers. Viewer discretion is advised.

Screams in Corpus Christi

Our first stop involves a Facebook post made by a resident of Corpus Christi, Texas. On Sunday, May 31, of 2020, a user named Bernal uploaded a video of a strange sound he heard while out on a walk the night before. In the description, he describes his encounter as the following:

The footage is about three minutes long. Have a listen.

-play video-

Now I'll be honest, we've seen videos with screams like this before, and, in hindsight I'm pretty convinced that at least a few of those are mountain lions.

Here though, it sounds a bit different. While mountain lions are no stranger to West and South Texas, something about this one just sounds human... Like, here, just listen for yourself.

-play comparison-

What do you think? While I'd like to keep a level head here, something about this one, to me, just doesn't scream mountain lion...

No matter what it is, though, hearing sounds like this, especially on a walk that late at night, would absolutely send me beelining it back home if I were ever to hear it myself...

-fade-

Abduction

Nighttime drives are extremely relaxing. I don't know what it is but something about em just puts my mind at rest. It's weird though, because when the sun goes down, things change. People come out, you encounter events you otherwise wouldn't, and, well, if you're like person we're about to get to, you just might witness a potential abduction.

On the night of September 19th of 2016, a YouTuber by the name of Dashcam Daily uploaded series of videos to this playlist, titled 2016-0919 Girl Ejected. If the name isn't enough to pique your interest, then what he captured while out on his drive just might.

This series documents a roughly 23-minute timespan of their pursuit of an erratic driver in Atlanta, Georgia. Dashcam Daily describes the chase as the following:

This encounter started at approximately 3:40 AM Sunday morning on September 19, 2016 in Atlanta, GA. I phoned 911 at the point where the girl was ejected from the vehicle and the driver placed her back in the car and drove away. Part 1 is the initial encounter where I first noticed the car stopped in the roadway. This was at the I-75/85 and University Ave interchange in Atlanta, GA.

Let's have a look.

-play part 1-

He continues: Part 2 is after I got turned around and noticed the driver was out of the car and had put the girl in the passenger side.

Part 3 covers most of the pursuit through Atlanta, and the driver leaving the girl on an I-20 access ramp at the Glenwood Ave/Memorial Dr exit.

These descriptions reveal to us that matters aren't getting any better. Whatever dispute they're currently going through is becoming exponentially worse, and that driver needs to be stopped as soon as possible. Opening a car door, combined with reckless driving is a recipe for incredibly serious injury or death.

At about two minutes into the video, we observe Dashcam Daily in their continued pursuit, but here the driver inevitably loses control of the vehicle. The following is what happened:

-play segment with audio-

After this bizarre incident, he continues his pursuit. About 15 minutes and numerous stops later, the car finally pulls over, giving the passenger enough time to jump out.

-play segment-

Fortunately, the driver left her behind before things escalated even further. The remaining footage that the cammer caught simply shows the rest of his pursuit before eventually losing the driver for good. According to an update in the description: A reporter with a local station has been in touch with the Atlanta Police. They were able to locate the female, because the license plate on the vehicle was in her name. The guy driving the car is/was apparently her boyfriend. She is refusing to cooperate or press charges, and would not give the police his name. The ladies in the vehicle that stayed with the victim transported her to Atlanta Medical Center. According to the reporter, she later had to be restrained/sedated. As far as I'm aware she recovered from her injuries.

Thankfully, she made it out of this situation alive and without any major injuries since this could've easily been so much worse. This footage is a testament to how dangerous situations like this can get, especially at high speeds in a motor vehicle. If you ever witness something like this, try to stop and help. Much like Dashcam Daily did on that late September night, you just might save a life...

Kidnapping

Waking up to realize that your child's missing is every parent's worst nightmare. Unfortunately, this was a grim reality for a New Zealand family.

On the morning of August 9th, 2017, a report was made to Auckland police regarding an 11-day old baby that was taken in the late hours of the night. The entire incident was captured on video. Have a look:

-play video-

Thankfully, the infant was located and returned to the parents seven hours after their report. I can only imagine how agonizing that timespan must've been, realizing that they may not have ever seen their child again, but, at least the baby's safe and sound. Good on that front.

When we hone our focus in on the abductor, though, that's when this story gets even stranger.

According to reports, this wasn't just some random stranger. This was a caretaker that was hired by the family to watch over their newborn as the mother was recovering from childbirth in the hospital. A woman by the name of Nadene Faye Manukau-Togiavalu was the one captured and charged in the kidnapping. As it turns out, she concealed her criminal record and posed as a fake caretaker in Auckland. She was so dedicated to her lie, that she even went forth to throw a fake baby shower for the nonexistent child and even sport a fake baby bump for the months leading up to the abduction.

She was eventually sentenced to three years in jail, however was released after just three months. She was ordered to perform 400 hours of community service and to pay $2000 to the family for reparations, however they, understandably, are not pleased with that outcome.

Nadene violated their privacy while they were at their most vulnerable, and she lied to their faces regarding her criminal history. Now that she's out again, who's to say she won't do it once more...?

Collapse of the Dance Floor

On the 24th of May 2001, the wedding of Keren and Asaf Dror was taking place in Jerusalem, Israel. Everything appeared to be going well, and the crowd seemed to be having a great time. At around 10:45pm, however, the event would rapidly devolve into a nightmare. Around that time, the floor would suddenly give out, resulting in a three-story fall for those that were in attendance. The entire catastrophe was captured on video:

-play video-

23 people died that night, and over 380 suffered from non-fatal injuries. One of those affected was the bride themselves, who suffered a pelvic injury that required corrective medical attention.

After investigations into this ramped up, it was eventually determined that the accident was caused by insufficient building materials and negligence during construction. It was allegedly built using a relatively new method at the time called Pal-Kal, invented by a man named Eli Ron. It, by all accounts, serves as a cost-saver and utilizes thin steel sheets sandwiched between concrete layers. The building supposedly was also designed to be a two-story structure, and the third floor was added later on. Put two and two together, and you can see why calling this structure a hazard would be an understatement.

As if the story wasn't strange enough already, the three owners of the wedding hall, the construction managers, and even Eli Ron, yes, the inventor of the Pal-Kal method itself, were charged with varying degrees of manslaughter and underwent various prison sentences. All of these were less than four years long.

In a statement given by the father of the bride afterwards, they claimed: I'd give the four of them 400 years in prison. Had they been pardoned, it would be 300 years, so they have no chance to see daylight.

-fade-

In the moments leading up to the fall, a song named I Have a Golden Heart by Sarit Haddid was playing, much to the crowds delight, however since this event, she's never performed it again. The Versailles Wedding Hall Disaster has gone down as one of the country's worst building catastrophes in recent history, and the now-vacant site will forever stand as a reminder of the tragic events that played out that late summer night...

JojoTsai

Heartbreak can be detrimental to someone's mental health, and especially so, if the other person leaves due to circumstances out of their control.

In February of 2014, an Instagram user by the name of JojoTsai1012 would post text message conversations essentially chronicling her relationship with her boyfriend at the time. The messages mostly appear to be pretty ordinary, with the pair talking frequently about music, their future aspirations, food, gifts that they'd buy each other during the holidays, and even the occasional argument. Nothing really stood out as abnormal...

-pause-

Until a few weeks later.

Fast forward, and you quickly realize that something went terribly awry. On March 6th, of 2014, Jojo would post their text message conversation one last time, however here, it was captioned with the following:

We broke up for twelve days. I hang out with all kinds of men, eat, watch movies, drink, sing, and any one of them is more handsome than him and richer than him. I said this just to show that I can't find a better man than him, let alone I figured how handsome and rich he is.

There are a lot of well-conditioned men around me, and friends who know me know it, but I can't accept others in my heart. Every time I play, I cry and I force myself. Smiling, I told myself that "the most important thing to be a human being is to be happy." I kept hypnotizing myself, but after all, I couldn't hypnotize my heart. I don't understand. Since it's not me, why should I give me so many expectations and promises? Since he didn't even want to have a baby with me, why did I have to name it? He said that if his mother did not agree for us to marry, he would talk to me about a lifelong relationship, and we would get married when we were old. This is really the most romantic love story I have ever heard in my life, but it is also a lie. I can't forget these things, they can't be forgotten, unless I die.

From here on out, she'd make 13 more posts all aimed at her now-ex in the span of just two days. The first involves her wearing some sort of eyepatch. One commenter believes that she's wearing it due to the sheer amount of crying she's done since the breakup. Whether or not this is true is unclear, but she is wearing it for a few pictures onwards.

The next shows her smiling with a cup of tea. The caption reading: From now on, you'll never see this kind of smile again.

[Two posts later] Did you know that there is a bird without legs? He can only fly around in the sky in his life, sleep in the wind when he is tired, and can only land once in his life, that is when he died.

[Next post] It turns out that all the nightmares I had in those few days were real, and the things I dreamed about were really happening. It was just that I was concealed and knew nothing about it. Everything was known to me. I have never done anything in my life. Bad things, why do you want me to suffer such torture? I have been living so hard these days. I want to let myself forget all of this. I want to control my emotions. Don't cry every night, but I can't do it. I can't do it. All this is right. It's too unfair to me, I can't bear it.

[Next post] After I die, I will haunt you day and night, and I will never leave you again.

[Next post] Husband, Dad, my prince, in your next life, you must fulfill your promise to marry me, and you can't break your promise.

[Two posts later] Don't forget the good things we used to be.

[Next post] I never thought that you'd deceive me, but I still love you.

[Next post] Let it burn. All the things like ashes float away.

After this post, Jojo would go forth to upload this photo of her sitting on the edge of a building. There is no caption, however considering those in which we just read, it's clear what this image implies.

The last picture she ever uploaded was this one, showing more things being burnt. It's unclear what exactly this is, but some have speculated that these are her ex's belongings, serving as one final goodbye to him. After this point, she never posted again.

It's widely claimed around the internet that Jojo committed suicide by jumping off the ledge. Interestingly, most of the articles claiming so are just regurgitating the same information off of each other. I haven't been able to dig up any official document or news directly from the scene, so I unfortunately can't confirm if this is actually the case.

The only bit of actual confirmation, and, take this for how you will, comes from an online forum named Mop. Her alleged neighbor supposedly made a post, claiming the following: “THIS IS REAL, WE LIVE IN THE SAME BUILDING, SHE DIED SATURDAY MORNING. NO MATTER WHAT, HOW MUCH COURAGE MUST IT HAVE TAKEN FOR A LITTLE GIRL TO KILL HERSELF? HOPE SHE WILL FIND PEACE IN THE AFTERLIFE.”

And I agree. I truly hope she’s finally at peace.

The root of this situation’s something that we’ve all endured. Heartbreak is a powerful thing. The agonizing plague that consumes us whenever it happens. Unfortunately for Jojo, it led her to take her own life that had so much going for it...

-fade-

Closing Remarks

As we’ve seen tonight, if you look hard enough within this vast digital ocean, you just might find things that are dark, eerie, and incredibly distressing.

Tonight, you and I have explored five Disturbing Things from Around the Internet. I hope you enjoyed this, and if you have any recommendations for smaller online oddities that can fit into a future compilation, please send your suggestion to my new email inbox made specifically for this series, dtfaisubmissions@gmail.com.

Thanks so much for watching. I’ll see you in the next one, I love you all, and good night.