Personal Log
Day 14 continued, Night
Janice L.

I've grown another two cups over the course of the day. This does not refer to the volume of milk inside my breasts; this is the real growth of my breast tissue after I have emptied myself completely. Luckily the workday has ended and I do not need to conceal them any longer, but I fear even my sports bra won't be able to hide them come tomorrow. By the end of today, it was already far too uncomfortable to wear. The way it squeezes my breasts produces too much stimulation and leaves me feeling far too full.

Laura was staring at me strangely all day. I can't be certain, but I think she knows something is wrong with me. Her eyes linger on my chest. Is it because of my rapidly increasing size? Does she see me leaking through my shirt? Do women know when other women are lactating? Perhaps by some kind of sixth sense? I can't tell for sure. She is suspicious, though. My constant stifled moans don't help, nor does it help when she catches me staring down her shirt. Considering she unbuttoned an extra button, I'm starting to think she's teasing me on purpose.

Given my extreme growth and milk production, I can't help but wonder how far BOLS could make Laura's breasts expand. Does the subject's body chemistry make a difference? Some women already display a genetic predisposition to overproduce milk. Some are known to produce up to two gallons (!!!) in a day! If I were to infect a pregnant woman who already suffered from overproduction, the results could be devastating. I can't imagine the flood of milk their body would have to accommodate.

My breasts show no sign of stopping. They certainly won't with how I've been suckling and massaging myself. I'm not sure I want it to stop... At least I haven't been immobilized like the cows yet. I don't know how much longer I can stand the ever-constant pressure. It's exhilarating and uncomfortable at the same time. Milk pushes my chest larger even as I write this. Surely there must be a limit. What happens if I ignore them for too long...?